Summer is over and that means your kids are off to school.

You thought you were excited to finally be rid of them for most of the day but instead you find yourself wondering what they're doing

When they finally come home from school, you realize how much you've missed them.

"How was your day at school?!" you say. "Fine," they reply. Now what?

How do you talk to your kids when they come home from school?

PBS \(http://www.pbs.org/parents/education/going-to-school/talking-with-kids-about-school/talking-strategies/\) offers a number of strategies for parents to get their kids talking. Some of them include greeting your kid with an enthusiastic hello, avoiding face to face interrogations, and even allowing your child to be silent for a while.

When the conversation does pick up, there are some questions that might help it flow more naturally and get you more information about their experience at school.

Below are some questions to ask your child after their school day.

1. What made you smile today?
2. What do you think of your teacher?
3. How would you make it the best day ever?
4. How did you help someone today?
5. Who inspired you today?
6. Who is the weird kid in class?
7. What challenged you today?
8. What did you regret today?
9. Where do you play on the playground?
10. What was something weird someone did/say today?
11. Who did you sit with at lunch?

12. What's your least favorite subject?
13. Who is someone at school that could use a friend?
14. What was your favorite part of the day?
15. What are you looking forward to tomorrow at school?
16. What is one thing you could do at home, during school?
17. Which of your teachers would survive a zombie apocalypse?
18. If your teacher was your age, would you be friends with them?
19. Why do you like your classroom?
20. How did somebody help you today?
